

Introduction

A Challenge

Modern law and religion are essential sociopolitical phenomena that have in common some veiled elements. Both aspire to constitute, or at least to frame, human consciousness and behaviour in all spheres of private and public life. Accordingly, modern law and religion are complementary, contradictory and simultaneous sources of rule-making, adjudication and execution. Both embed obedience and obligations, leadership, institutions and legal ideology as foundations of their maintenance and prevalence, based on a strict structure of commands. Modern law and religion are engendered through written and oral intergenerational – sometimes transnational – texts that are enforceable through authorities, and are subjected to authoritative, corresponding and alternative hermeneutics. Since modern law and religion are infinitely dynamic bounded spaces of institutions, professionalism and social mobilization, they are carriers and subjects of political power. They colonize through, and are colonized in, political power. Hence, as we will discover below, in various contexts they may, paradoxically, challenge, maintain and generate state political power.

From antiquity to current modernity amid various historical transformations, some of which have been revolutionary, law and religion have never been completely separated. They have never been so independent as to achieve complete autonomy from each other. Religion has essentially been embodied in modern legal systems, even in those that have aspired to privatize religion. Religions are embedded in daily practices in various regions, from the Middle East through Africa to Europe, from Latin America to North America and Asia, in Western regimes and post-communist regimes alike.

The compound interactions and multifaceted mutuality between law and religion, as excavated in this volume, deserve a distinctive scholarly attention on account of their immense sociopolitical significance. This volume aims to exhibit different voices of various scholars who are responding to the challenge of comprehending those interactions and mutuality. Religion and law should be redeemed from their imagined setting as metaphysical mythological entities and be conceptualized as relative sociopolitical phenomena.

Beyond the Myth of State–Church Separation

Some years ago the US Federal Supreme Court ruled in two salient legal cases on education and religion. Notwithstanding differing legal rulings, they both lay bare the need for, and inevitability of, going beyond the myth of separation between state and religion. In 1971 the Amish community argued before the Court that its children should be exempted from attending state public schools after the eighth grade.¹ Counterintuitively to the First Amendment and its anti-establishment clause, the Court upheld the Amish's religious arguments, defying the state of Wisconsin's claims against the constitutionality of religious exemptions from equal state education.

¹ Wisconsin v. Yoder 406 US 205 (1972). The case was argued on 8 December, 1971 and decided on 15 May, 1972.

The main reasoning behind the ruling was articulated in Chief Justice Burger's decision:

In sum, the unchallenged testimony of acknowledged experts in education and religious history, almost 300 years of consistent practice, and strong evidence of a sustained faith, pervading and regulating respondents' entire way of life support the claim that the enforcement of the State's requirement of compulsory formal education after the eighth grade would gravely endanger if not destroy the free exercise respondents' religious beliefs.²

In 1994 in the Kiryas Joel case, the Satmar Hasidik Jewish community in Brooklyn, NYC, asked the Court to recognize the legality of New York law, which had designated the establishment of a public school. The community argued for the need in such a designated school since ultra-Orthodox physically challenged children could not attend any other school for lack of appropriate facilities.³ As might have been expected, based on the anti-establishment clause, the Court dismissed the community's claims and tailored the legislation as null and void.

Justice Souter argued for the rationale embedded in the Court's ruling:

The fundamental source of constitutional concern here is that the legislature itself may fail to exercise governmental authority in a religiously neutral way. The... case specific nature in creating this district for a religious community leaves the Court without any direct way to review such state action for the purpose of safeguarding a principle at the heart of the Establishment Clause, the government should not prefer one religion to another, or religion to irreligion.⁴

In both rulings the Court admits the crucial importance of religion in American public life and accordingly emphasizes the need to protect religious educational practices even of non-liberal fundamentalist religious communities. The Amish desired to gain an autonomous system of education based on their religious dicta. The Court granted the alleged constitutional remedy, albeit founded upon the rhetorical argument of federal non-interference in communal religious autonomy due to the anti-establishment clause. The Satmar claimed to assist physically challenged ultra-Orthodox students who could not learn in the state's (secular) non-Jewish schools. They were denied their claim on the basis of a similar rhetorical judicial argument of the anti-establishment clause. In both legal cases, however, the Court had to face difficulties embedded in liberal jurisprudence in order to acknowledge the democratic pressures to embrace non-liberal religious collectivities.

The Western liberal constitutional myth of the separation of religion from the state is utterly problematic (Barzilai, 2003; Carter, 1995) since religion is irreducibly significant in formation of modern states, laws and legal ideologies. Thus, surveys in Europe, for example, demonstrate to what degree religion is prominent in both liberal and post-communist political regimes. In relation to religious practices of praying in church, the figures are illuminating: 88 per cent in Ireland, 85 per cent in Poland, 69 per cent in Northern Ireland, 51 per cent in Italy, 43 per cent in Switzerland, 41 per cent in Portugal, 39 per cent in Spain, 34 per cent in Hungary, 34 per cent in West Germany, 30 per cent in the Netherlands, 24 per cent in the UK, 20 per cent in (East) Germany and 17 per cent in France attended church 'at least monthly' (Bruce, 1999, p. 90, Table 4.1). Obviously, fluctuations in levels of secularization and religiosity are to be expected. Yet the significance of religion as a central political and legal phenomenon in modernity is far from being marginal.

² Ibid.

³ Board of Education of Kiryas Joel v. Grumet (1994). The case was argued on 30 March 1994 and decided on 27 June 1994.

⁴ Ibid.

Although there are institutional, organizational and cultural variances between and among political regimes and religions, religion amidst neo-liberal transnational and international expansion ('globalization') is prominent as a sociopolitical legal force. This diverse volume with its multiplicity of intellectual voices, explores some facets of religion in the local–global nexus. Religion is conspicuous despite of, in reaction to, and even as part of, ethos and practices of secular rationality and teleological modernity at the outset of the third millennium. Intriguingly, religion is even fused in modernity. It is constructing for its needs and interests some major aspects of modernity, such as the transnational world economy, nation-state law and the language of liberal human rights, as well as communications technology and the Internet. Nevertheless, callous conflicts between liberalism as values, norms and practices and non-liberal non-ruling religious communities are common. Inter alia, such conflicts have erupted in Belgium, England, France, Germany, India, Israel, the Netherlands, Spain, Turkey and the USA. These conflicts are significantly meaningful even in states where a formal liberal separation between state and Church is professed, as in France and the USA. This volume, through its various prisms and inclusive spirit, is committed to elucidating the multifaceted aspects of modernity and religion in and towards law.

This volume differs from studies that have conceived religion in singular constitutional terms of 'freedom of religion', 'freedom from religion', 'anti-establishment clause' and 'state neutrality'. Furthermore, it diverges from, and is critical of, studies that portray religion and religious law as chiefly non-modern and primordial social phenomena that are driven to constitute an image of savagery and terrorism. Rather, this anthology advances a theoretical and empirically-based concept that inquiries into religion and law should be sensitive to the versatilities of religious law and the pluralities of religions, and their possible adaptations to, and reconciliation with, modernity. Our capacity to generalize important aspects of law and religion should be subjected to such a theoretical, empirical and methodological sensitivity to contexts of meanings.

This volume has as a lucid intellectual context. About 30 years after Max Weber's death in 1920 his studies of Buddhism, Christianity, Confucianism, Hinduism, Islam, Judaism and Taoism (Weber, 1951, 1952, 1956, 1960) had remained unmatched and only infrequently touched by law and society scholars. Only with the rising influence of anthropological studies, largely by Adamson Hoebel and his students, was our knowledge enriched with insights on religions and religious law (Hoebel, 1954; Pospisil, 1973). However, since the 1980s legal pluralism has highlighted cultural disharmonies that generate normatively justified cultural relativism. It has called for an understanding of different legal traditions in their interactive relations through unveiling and decentering state law and legal ideology as relative traditions as well (Merry, 1988; Sarat and Berkowitz, Chapter 18, this volume; Twining, 1986, 2000; Santos, 1995). In the context of legal pluralism and political power, this volume encourages us to look into whether the multiplicity of religious practices – possibly even fundamentalist religious practices – is reconcilable with democratic order (see Sarat and Berkowitz, Chapter 18).

Religion offers epistemological guidance for viewing the universe through a set of communal and individual practices, driven by faith in transcendental, sacred and invincible forces. It constitutes and reflects meanings of existence in every domain of private and public human life. It can neither be comprehended solely based on criteria of ‘rational’ and ‘irrational’, nor can it be understood as secluded from other sociopolitical phenomena (Asad, 1993).

The Veiled Alliance: Law and Religion

Intimate relations between law and religion have been constituted and constantly transformed throughout history. According to natural religious law – a law driven from a faith in God or in divine forces – morality and legality are embedded in religion. Sacred law formulates a space for human choices and judicial discretion in the articulation of a celestial divine order. Such a natural religious prism of law – prominent in the writings of theological thinkers in different religions such as St Augustine, Thomas Aquinas and Maimonides – has not only been a normative indicator of a good faith and a virtuous behaviour, but also the absolute criterion for obedience and disobedience to human-made law. Thus, St Augustine has been a very influential religious thinker over Western thought. His religious concept of De Civitate Dei has generated a religious normative model for the perfection of human society and expectations that political power in the ‘City of God’ should be legitimated through a religious faith. His model has influenced a diversity of philosophers and scholars, including Enlightenment and contemporary philosophers.

Spurred by post-medieval science and the rationalization of law as science, natural law, as distinct from what has remained as religious natural law, has been secularized, particularly since the fourteenth century AD. In a gradual process, which was imprinted, inter alia, by the sixteenth-century Copernican revolution, followed by such rationalizations of faith as in seventeenth-century Descartes and Kant’s philosophies of the eighteenth century, religious ethics and religious law were reproduced based on human consciousness and rationality. While the importance of religious faith was regenerated as part of human experience, questions revolving around the existence of God were marked as unique and separated from the routinely rational endeavours of humanity. Hence, human law and religion were distinguished from one another. Whichever human legal categories we construct, they are significantly a matter of our own morality and consciousness.

The partial divorce of law from religious dicta and its construction as an ‘autonomous’ professional field have framed law as a ruling setting. Accordingly, a concept of divine sovereignty, an earthly sacred religious ruling authority, was replaced by a concept of the secular state’s sovereignty. Especially during the seventeenth century and onwards, the latter was imagined as an aggregation of individual wills embedded in contractual metaphorical relations. Although religious institutions could have been separated from the state through various institutional arrangements, which may significantly vary from one country to another, religious identities and virtues of religious faith have remained cemented in state law and its legal ideology. Hence, an additional reasoning underlying this volume is that any understanding of modern law should deconstruct an imagined separation between religion and modern state law.

These genealogical facets of religion in law and law in religion that have been expounded above are not progressively ordered in a linear historicity of teleological modernity. Rather, they are complementary in any historical period, despite some significant variance in the intimacies of law, religion and power in various historical periods. Yet, clearly religion has been a certain noteworthy source of human rights.

Religions as Sources of Human Rights

The essays in Part I of this volume address the religious origins of modern human rights and explicate interactions between religious origins and contemporary modern law. In Chapter 1 Michael J. Perry argues that, and explains why, the concept of human dignity and human rights is inescapably religious. Furthermore, he demonstrates how alternative arguments for atheistic foundations of modern human rights collapse unless they acknowledge the religious origins of modern human dignity. Modern human dignity is based on the notion of the (religious) sacredness of every human being.

The embedded affinities between law and religion are not singularly historically ontological but metaphorical as well. Paul Lehmann (Chapter 2) shows how religion is embedded in modern law through framing its epistemology and language. Law with no religion causes legalistic formulations to prevail over justice. Hence, responsibility for power may triumph over power of responsibility. The function of religious metaphors in law is crucial since they contribute to the virtues that might generate justice as the marker of the essence of law.

Whereas Perry and Lehmann have deconstructed the rigid boundary between modernity and religion, and between religious law and modern law, the remainder of the essays in Part I analyse specific historical developments of religious law from antiquity to modernity in several civilizations. In Chapter 3 Daniel Friedmann excavates the logic in the Halachik law of trials. Through analysing biblical narratives Friedmann demonstrates how Jewish law has allowed the evolution of judicial discretion within the meta-narrative of the Torah as a divine constitution. Accordingly, biblical stories constructed a belief in God and in its dicta to constitutionally engineer social mechanisms of communal disciplinary powers. A similar process is traced in ancient Greek mythologies. Once religion and law are understood as part of sociopolitical power, legal developments in rules of evidence, trial procedures, judicial discretion, criminal investigation and executive mechanisms are better understood.

Giovanni Ambrosetti (Chapter 4) conceives natural religious law as a junction of reason, theology and history. His essay turns the focus on to Christian natural law that originated in religious scriptures and was only later – especially after the seventeenth century – conceptualized as a rationalistic enterprise. Natural law is not a dogmatic myth; rather, it is constantly and dynamically unveiled through a faith in Christian revelation. The practice of revealed natural law is shaped through obedience, rights and duties of daily legality that have practical meaning in the light of social contexts in which obedience to religious law is being cultivated.

More generally, Harold Berman argues in Chapter 5 that Western legal tradition was founded on religious Christian–Judaic fundamentals. He traces its history from 1050 AD when the Roman Catholic Church was established. Canonical law and the first legal books and universities in Europe were established in the eleventh century around the corpus of law which was created by the Church in order to control its property, personnel and knowledge and to enforce its religious faith. Hence, religious law was the main source of modern European law. The secularization of Western law since the sixteenth century was advanced through the Reformist Lutheran, English, French, American and Russian revolutions. These revolutions have altered the structure of Western law through greater institutional separation of law from the Church, but have not drastically diminished the importance of religion in law. Calvin and Luther had resisted the Roman Catholic Church's political domination and religious monopoly, but had recognized and reinforced the intimate relations between various usages of law and religious faith. Thus, Calvinism preached the usage of law as a method of reform, which in turn led to the emergence of John Locke's seventeenth-century liberalism. Berman argues that liberalism was the first secular religion to disengage itself from some religious fundamentals although it has nevertheless relied on quite a few religious elements. Those elements, excavated by Berman, may be the basic elements that will constitute the future of international law of human rights.

In Chapter 6 Noel J. Coulson explores law and religion in Islam. Islamic religious law is composed of different, but reconcilable, elements of (traditional) Shari'a and judge-made law in the Muslim state. Shari'a has conceived its law as entirely comprehensive, concerning all aspects of human life and exclusively reflecting the divine will. Since the nineteenth century, Islam has been divided between Shari'a legal ideology that is aimed to be totalistic and judicial practices in various Muslim countries. While Shari'a has been vigorously applied in family law, state law that has been mainly constructed by judges has been dominant in criminal and commercial law and has in practice reformed Shari'a to be more receptive to modern human rights. Even in family law habitual Shari'a-based practices such as polygamy and talaq (a man's right to unilaterally dissolve his marriage) have been significantly reformed and restrained. Coulson explains how, in order to mitigate possible severe crises of legitimacy, these legal reforms in various Muslim states, such as Egypt, Iran and Tunisia, have rhetorically been constructed through Shari'a as if guided by divine Muslim dicta.

Other aspects of Islamic law are excavated by Mahdi Zahraa in Chapter 7. His perspective focuses on the internal logic of Islamic law. Two major dimensions in Islamic law are the methodology of developing the law (usul al-fiqh) and the set of practical solutions to daily problems to be offered in the realm of Islamic law (al-masa'el wa al-furu'). However, within that seemingly ordered paradigm, meaningful struggles over hermeneutics have prevailed, while the common denominator is obedience to the basic fundamentals of the Shari'a. Hence, Mahdi claims, Islamic law can be adaptable to various contexts through diverse hermeneutics as long as the interpretations are based on common Islamic methodology and rules of interpretations.

Religions as Traditions of Law

Religion does not merely constitute a major source of modern human rights; it also constitutes a certain ontology in modern nationalism and law. Mainly since the nineteenth century, nationalism has utilized religion for its political purposes. Through legal categorizations nation-states have framed religious myths to consolidate a national ethos. Based on the fact that they are sociopolitical forces that comprise and reflect strong human desires and expectations, religion and nationality were intertwined to consolidate a political mechanism that mobilizes people with different interests towards what may be perceived as a common public goal (Migdal, 1988, 2004).

The constitutive interactions between religion and nationality that empower each other in modern legality have contradicted not a few sociopolitical generalizations. Emile Durkheim conceptualized that modern societies would necessarily undergo rigorous secularization (Pickering, 1984). He was therefore concerned about what would happen to modern societies without the effects of religion as a crucial and functional consolidating social force. Falsifying Durkheim religion is a vivid tradition and a national civil force in modern political regimes in many regions around the globe. Hence, various nation-states have employed different modes of public strategies to manage the challenges of religion as a massive sociopolitical force at both elite and grassroots levels.

One such legalistic political strategy excluded religion from being a publicly organized political force. It was integrated into the state's invasive endeavours to construct a fundamentally secular statehood and national collectivity that is systematically socialized to be unattached to (past) religious attachments. Thus, national projects of the state's de-religiosity, at various levels of intensity and in various political settings, were prominent in Turkey during the 1920s and 1960s, and in some authoritarian/totalitarian regimes like the Soviet Union-led communist regimes after the 1920s and then after 1945 until the 1980s, as well as in China after 1949. These different political–legal efforts often resulted in resistance and religious dissent among minorities (for example, in Turkey), the Church (for example, in Poland), and in various localities (for example, in China).

The constitutional institutional privatization of religion has been a second political legalistic strategy. This has been driven by a liberal vision of freedom of religion, as in the archetypical examples of France and the USA since the eighteenth century. Either through a legal ideology of secular republicanism (France) or state neutrality (the USA), that strategy has professed formal prohibition on the state's direct endorsement of any specific religious institution. In practice, however, the institutional privatization of religion has prevented religious non-ruling communities from attaining governmental direct support for equality. It has further resulted in national attempts to subdue, in practice, the religious collective demands, habits and needs of religious minorities, especially non-liberal religious communities (Barzilai, 2003; Shachar, 2001).

Alongside liberal endeavours to secularize the state as in France, or to release it from concrete institutional religious formal commitments, as in the USA, another legalistic political strategy has formally recognized the religious communalism of minorities, while state law has prominently propelled its own religious identity. Such a strategy of co-opting dominant religion in state law and legal ideology, and yet recognizing and even constructing religious non-ruling communities, has been used by states for circumventing other collective identities of the very same non-ruling communities. Thus, Israeli law has somewhat followed the Millet (community) system that had characterized the Ottoman Empire. Accordingly, Israeli Arab-Palestinians were constructed and recognized in state law as religious minorities (Muslims, Christians, Bedouins, Druze), and then were denied collective national rights as Palestinians.

A somewhat similar fourth political legal strategy has been employed by states that have aspired to be maintained as secular and yet uphold their religious communalism. India is an important example: after hectic debates in India's political forums at the end of the 1940s, the state was framed as secular, although religious communities have been bestowed with some group rights. A less professed secularism of the state, accompanied by constitutional protections for minorities, has been a foundational arrangement in the German Grundgesetz (Basic Law) as well.

The fifth political legalistic strategy is generated in states that have co-opted one religion as a formal dominant social force that is integrated into the state, while preserving the worship rights of others. England, Ireland, Italy, Portugal, Spain and Argentina are some examples of states that have granted one specific religion a constitutional superiority while allowing others to preserve their right to cultivate their different religious practices.

Despite various political legalistic strategies of modern nationalism, religions have prevailed as vibrant traditions. Part II of this volume deals with several religious traditions that have been articulated and practised amid the shadows of state law.

In Chapter 8 Robert Cover discusses obligations and social order in Judaism. Cover argues for the effects of the state on religious traditions of law. Accordingly, he contrasts the Western legal tradition, with its emphasis on rights, with the Jewish legal tradition that stresses obligations. The latter was developed over the last two millennia among Jews living as minority groups with no state and sovereignty to rely upon. Consequently, whereas Western legal tradition underscored rights as a source of mythologizing the nation-state, the Jewish tradition emphasized obligations (Mitzvot) as a means of inciting Jewish communalism in the absence of a Jewish nation-state. While the Western nation-state in practice allowed for the evolution of rights in order to incite the collective good, in Judaism, as explained by Maimonides, obligations were clearly intended to uphold the communal Jewish good.

Judaism, Christianity and Islam have reflected only one fragment, however significant, of the relationships between states and religious traditions of law. Luke T. Lee and Whalen W. Lai (Chapter 9) focus on Confucian and Buddhist legal traditions in China. They elucidate how ethical rules of Confucianism (li) have interplayed with rigid legalism and its demands for obedience (fa). The Confucian tradition has preferred to thwart crime by relying on feelings of shame instead of relying on punishment, which may aggravate crime. While the state imposes punishment, Confucianism emphasizes such virtues as self-respect and conscience. In addition, Lee and Lai explain the characteristics of Buddhism and its effects on Chinese law. Buddhism has challenged the state, asserting an alternative communalism and an emphasis on mutual responsibility and self-regulating individuals. Although Buddhism has stood in opposition to state law in China because it expects its believers to disengage from statehood and be devoted to the Buddhist community, interactions between modern China and Buddhism have not necessarily generated conflicts. The state has recognized a certain autonomy of the Buddhist community, and the latter has never directly resisted the state. The unexpected result is a very multidimensional modern Chinese law, which conventionally may be perceived as secular but nonetheless embodies strong effects of religions as traditions of law.

Hinduism also testifies to multifaceted interactions between state power and religions as traditions of law. Ludo Rocher explains in his essay (Chapter 10) that Western notions of law pressured Hinduism only towards the end of the eighteenth century. Historically, obedience in Hinduism is embedded not in mere formal rigid law but in dharma – that is, the need of every human being to live in a transposable sense of balance with his or her environment. Law in its more stringent logic of ordered hierarchical set of regulations is part of dharma; however, law should not control dharma but, rather, be guided through it. Hence, Rocher's essay deconstructs any categorizations of religion and law as mutually separate. Rocher shows how any enforcement of Western law through English imperialism in India has been subjected to dharma and to intrinsic interactions of law and religion. However, principally since the beginning of the twentieth century, Hindu law and the hermeneutics of dharma have been more attentive to governmental purposes and have enabled the state to rule through national codification and a greater emphasis on administrative and criminal law.

Multicultural intercommunal probes into the infinite space of law and religion unveil aspirations for more direct dialogue between secularism and religiosity within the shadows of state law. In Chapter 11 Rebecca R. French deconstructs some problematic Western legalistic separations and epistemological dislocation of religion, law and politics. She invites us to talk to Buddhist Tibetans and be immersed in the Buddhist's perspective that these separations and dislocation do not exist in practice. In the Buddhist community, life is intrinsically religious and the law should maintain complete and comprehensive faith in Buddha. Secular law, as a dynamic and interchangeable subordinated category, can be relevant only when it concerns specific issues of administration. The divide between religious Buddhist law that dominates all daily practices and administrative issues which may be guided by secular law falls within the structure of the Buddhist natural religious law. Contrary to modern liberalism, there are no separate categories of religion and secularism. Rather, law in all its multiplicity is always governed by the principles of Buddhism. Thus, a state should be governed by a religious leader, such as the Dalai Lama, but may nevertheless be regarded as a constitutional democracy.

Religious law need not necessarily displace secular law. In Chapter 12 John Bowen explores how Islamic law in Indonesia is interlinked with secular law through judicial hermeneutics (see also Lev, 1972, 2000). Muslim law is being practised among different localities and is part of state law, especially when it concerns personal and family matters. Hence, religious law has survived in between local pressures and the colonial European influence over Indonesia (Lev, 1972, 2000).

The maintenance of non-liberal religious legal traditions in modernity should also be examined in light of modern technology, such as the Internet, which may hold secular symbols. In Chapter 13 Karine Barzilai-Nahon and Gad Barzilai present a theoretical framework for understanding interactions between religious fundamentalist communities and the Internet, through four dimensions of tensions and challenges: hierarchy, patriarchy, discipline and seclusion. They develop the concept of cultured technology, and analyse how religious communities reshape technology and construct it within their culture, while allowing it to engender certain changes in their customary life and law. The study examines cultured technology among ultra-Orthodox Jewish communities in Israel and is based on an original dataset of 686,192 users and 60,346 virtual communities. While formal law in these communities remains suspicious of modern technology, in practice the community elite allows the community to adapt and culturally construct it for communal socioeconomic needs. Hence, between state law that embraces liberalism and the Internet with its secular manifestations ultra-Orthodoxy upholds its legal tradition with practical adaptations.

Religions and Human Rights: Conflicts

Part III focuses on conflicts between liberalism as culture, political and legal ideology and political power, on the one hand, and religion and communalism, on the other hand. The challenge for liberal jurisprudence has been to reconcile the state's veiled religious identities with its asserted egalitarian commitments to freedom of, and from, religion. Liberalism has responded to that challenge by means of two arguments. First, individual rights precede any other concrete and distinct definition of the 'common good'. Second, the state is neutral and can provide impartial procedural justice (Rawls, 1973, 1993; Barry, 1995). Accordingly, it is constructed as if the state's religious identities do not exist and cannot obstruct the preference given to individuals' freedoms over any republican, religious, good. These two fundamental liberal claims are problematical. First, nation-states do have a certain religious republican good. Hence, giving absolute and exclusive preference to individual rights, invariably under all possible contexts, would repress non-ruling religious communities (Barzilai, 2003), which have a different, but not indispensably contradictory, ontological conception of the 'good' (MacIntyre, 1984, 1988; Sandel, 1982, 1996).

Second, if individual rights are being exclusively underscored, any liberal de-ontological justice might regretfully be disengaged from complex human experiences. Members of non-ruling religious communities may not benefit and may even be damaged from the liberal discourse unless they are being stripped of their embedded identities. These types of conflict between liberalism, religion and non-ruling religious communities are the topics of Part III.

The frenzied contention over female circumcision as a prevalent custom in some Muslim communities – primarily in Africa – has been an ostensible example of a confrontation between non-liberal religious practices and human rights. Jessica A. Platt returning from a research journey in Africa argues, in Chapter 14, for the prerequisite of cultural relativism when seriously debating the practice of circumcision. She claims that there are possibilities for education and clinical medicine to mitigate between this religious custom and the international community's imperative to preserve human rights.

Platt analyses important efforts made by international law and some domestic legislation, driven by liberal aspirations and intended to prohibit women's circumcision since 1948. However, international law also empowers freedom of religion. Hence, the essay raises two points of critical review of the conflict between liberalism and non-liberal religions. First, the legal prohibitions have infringed upon non-liberal communities' freedom of religion. Second, the legalistic prohibitions have not eradicated the problem, but have instead resulted in more circumcision being performed clandestinely, evading state supervision. Consequently, the legislation has increased the likelihood of health risks and even death among young girls undergoing this practice. Platt offers an alternative solution – a balance between human rights and the religious custom of circumcision through allowing only spiritual or very light types of circumcision under clinical supervision. Instead of intrusive criminalization of a religious custom, however problematic, she calls for women to be educated and informed about the severe damage that circumcision inflicts upon them. Criminalization in law should be very specific and only enforced upon severe violent types of circumcision that endanger the sexuality or health of the female and her children, while allowing for spiritual and light undamaging types of circumcision that reflect religious freedom.

In the face of mounting discussions in the West concerning the rights of Muslim women, Nayer Honarvar (Chapter 15) explores women rights in Islamic societies based on a genealogical analysis of Shari'a formal law. She delineates a severe conflict between the formal Shari'a law and human rights. Comparing Muslim women's socioeconomic legal status with that of Arabian and Persian women before Islam, women's conditions deteriorated after the seventh century AD, once Shari'a law was imposed. Islam is a male-dominated setting, Honarvar argues. Thus, in marriage, divorce and inheritance, Muslim law clearly tends to favour men. Men are entitled to polygamy, whereas women are forbidden to have more than one husband, for example.

Motherhood is highly esteemed in Islam, but once the marriage is dissolved the woman loses most of her custodial rights over her children. Honarvar argues that Islam has severely discriminated against women in education and economics as well. Although Islam has now improved women's legal status in inheritance, making them legal heirs of their husbands, women are still severely discriminated against in their inheritance rights compared with men. Hence the challenge remains as to whether international and national politics in Muslim societies, especially in Muslim political regimes, will significantly reform crucial facets in Muslim religious traditions of law.

Women's status in non-liberal communities may be reformed through globalization. In Chapter 16 Sally E. Merry examines Hawaiian women's struggles against violence. Her essay is a story of religion as a sociolegal force that mitigates abuse of females' rights. Merry tests three paradigms that are intended to rejuvenate the self in her struggles against violence – the rights, the community and the religious paradigms as approaches that are exercised by women in the context of globalization. Religion is practised as an alternative to a feminist rights-based approach. Through the Church the main values that are discussed among women are spirituality, communication, anger and forgiveness. Yet, and critically observed, religious healing is based on submission of women to men and male responsibility to hamper the dissolution of marriage. The underlying logic is trust in God, the sanctity of marriage and forgiveness. Religion approaches battered women in between the shadows of the law, since it assisted in saving battered women without criminalizing the actions of their husbands. However, the religious approach has marginalized feminist arguments against patriarchy and has therefore strengthened the male-dominated community.

As we see, religion in its multiplicity of forms and multidimensional facets may come into direct – even expressive – conflict with human rights. Nonetheless, religion itself embodies a space of human rights through which it may constitute a normative setting to raise dissent against the state. Thus, the principle of 'freedom of religion' may support even conscientious objection to military service, based on a broad abstraction of religion as conscience. In fact, 'religion' has broadly been constructed for exemption purposes from state law in such matters as military conscription, education and the labour market (Sturm, 1983).

Time and again, however, religious hermeneutics may be repressed by state legal ideology and state agents. As Robert Cover expounds in Chapter 17, state law has been violent towards non-ruling religious hermeneutics because it has eliminated these hermeneutics as viable sources of meaning, law-making and policy-making. The ruling elite – judges and justices included – have conceived those alternative religious meanings as sources of destabilizing the state. This does not mean that the state – as defined through its elite and institutions – is secular. The state itself conveys its own religious preferences, while it simultaneously acts coercively towards its non-ruling religious communities (cf. also Barzilai, 2003; Shachar, 2001).

Cover has highlighted collisions between the nomos (that is, basic world-views and normative aspirations) of non-ruling religious communities that have challenged the state and the state's interest in subduing these nomos in order to maintain a 'unified' national narrative. Amid myths of a unitary state law, Cover proposes a pluralistic interplay of all religious ontological conceptions of the ‘good’ as part of law-making and legal interpretations, whilst being aware of the state’s inability to activate an impartial justice. Challenging state law through the nomos of communities constitutes an alternative way of countering state violence.

Cover has perceptively conceptualized religion as a constitutive force of normative order, civil obedience and also as a source of oppression. Hence, in cases of serious conflicts between egalitarian principles, like equality, and the insularity of a religious community, Cover emphasizes the redemptive principle of egalitarianism that justifies limited state interference in the insularity of the community. However, he expects, as do other authors in this volume, a public policy of multiculturalism that respects the conflicts of hermeneutics, meanings and practices among and between the state and opposing religious communities.

The essays so far discussed in Part III show that possible severe encounters between human rights and acts of religious violence may exist. Certainly, a perspective that attributes a great deal of importance to religion in politics and law should neither justify violence in religious communities nor pretext it through underscoring secular violence as well. We have to ensure the human right of exit and the redemptive principle submitted by Robert Cover. The first principle claims that a potential victim deserves to leave her community and that she deserves a state’s protection against violence (Barzilai, 2003). The second principle asserts that if a state’s interference in a specific sphere of communal life is necessary to abolish discrimination, the interest in social redemption should overcome the principle of communal singularity and religious autonomy. Cover explains, however, that the internal religious order of non-ruling community should not be dissolved.

The last two essays explore why religious communities are not necessarily sources of conflict but, rather, sources of autonomy, liberty and international law. In Chapter 18 Austin Sarat and Roger Berkowitz are concerned with the legal claim for ‘order’ that has disabled any aspirations for multiculturalism. In order to show that law enables multiculturalism as long as its imagined order is not endangered, they compare two court rulings of the US Supreme Court, *Reynolds*⁵ and *Yoder*⁶ in which religious communities demanded recognition of their fundamentalist traditions and autonomy.

In Reynolds the Mormons’ request to recognize polygamy was dismissed, since polygamous marriage was considered by the Court as a savage habit that reflects and incites a ‘disordered’ society. In Yoder, on the contrary, the justices did not consider state law as being under threat since the Amish were considered as a small and peripheral community. Hence, a multiplicity of religious, even fundamentalist, practices was considered as reconcilable with political order. Sarat and Berkowitz claim that Yoder has not been an unexpected legal result. Rather, it has articulated the liberal precept that state law is the superior regulating order, while communal religious practices may be considered as legally valid only when they do not endanger the state’s perceived and self-generating order. Hence, modern law may be oblivious of the virtues of religious multiculturalism.

But does perpetuation of religious nomos allows construction of universal human rights? The last essay in the volume explains why respect for religious communities may be conducive to the growth of universalism. In Chapter 19 Shashi Tharoor criticizes the trendy articulation of human rights as exclusively relying on a Western concept of individualism and overtly or surreptitiously defying the important essence of non-Western communities. The essay suggests shifting the emphasis from intolerance towards religions to intolerance towards coercion. Thus, religious collectivities should be respected and defended, yet violent religious habits such as female mutilation and child marriages should be eradicated on account of their coercive nature. Tharoor's approach constructs universalism of human rights as a diversity of preserved traditions mutually reciprocating each other and jointly resisting coercion.

⁵ Reynolds v. United States, 98 US (1878).

⁶ Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 US (1971).

Religion is not a static phenomenon. It has become a source of dissent when, and to the extent that, it has been marginalized and discriminated against. In countries that have aimed to suppress religion, like Poland and Lithuania in Europe and Turkey in the Middle East, religion has incited some collective resistance to the state. Further, the Catholic Church in communist regimes, has used its power to oppose these regimes as was the case with the Catholic Church in East Germany. Similarly, Islamic movements in India and Israel have reacted to discrimination against, and marginalization of, their Muslim populations with rigorous collective and institutionalized dissent against the ruling elites – Hindu and Jewish, respectively. Sometimes, the religious dissent democratizes political settings as was the case in Poland and East Germany in the 1980s and 1990s.

Yet, religious dissent may become very violent either at the level of small groups or large social movements. In Israel, nationalistic Jewish fundamentalists have tended to severely criticize the state, which they perceived as too secular and too pro-Palestinian, especially since the conclusion of the Oslo Accords (1993–99). This led to the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on 4 November 1995. Likewise, violent religious dissent to state law conveyed by citizens against their political regimes has repeated itself, inter alia, in Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Russia, Sudan and the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, where Muslim groups and social movements have become major localities of dissent and violence against political regimes and their ruling elites.

Violent religious dissent is not accidental. Religious texts, either written or unwritten, have offered structured and sacred guidelines for an alternative order in all spheres of life. Our volume offers and invites a diversity of avenues to deconstruct religious texts as violent texts. Nevertheless, the global–local nexus may lead religious texts to be interpreted as being either violent or peaceful – much depends on the context.

The Challenge of 'Globalization'

As this volume demonstrates, religions are as vivid as ever. Religious fundamentalist movements in Christianity, Islam and Judaism have largely been generated in resistance to modernity and to its exclusive secular conception of historicity and legality. Often, this interaction of confronting modernity would not lead to violence. Nonetheless, under other conditions, collisions between neo-liberal globalization and religious fundamentalism may result in violence as was horribly proven on 11 September 2001 with Al-Qaeda's attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Religions may include subcultures of violence against 'external enemies', such as state law and state legal institutions that symbolize secular depravity. Hence, religious terrorism has been manifested in Western and non-Western political regimes, including Afghanistan, Algeria, Argentina, Egypt, England, France, India, Iraq, Israel, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Lebanon, North Ireland, Philippines, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Spain, Syria, Turkey and the USA (cf. Pape, 2005).

Why do religions sometimes spur terrorism as a possible hermeneutic against state law in the midst of neo-liberal globalization? It is an intriguing question since, as this volume demonstrates, religious fundamentalism is not necessarily violent. Yet, religious texts often ingrain a binary theological distinction between eternal redemptive good and irreducible evil. The cosmic struggle, including a possible violent clash between 'good' and 'evil' is historically transcendental and should end in apocalyptic warfare (Juergensmeyer, 2000). Once believers are persuaded that they are under attack from secularism, they may use religious texts as manifesto of the battle against perceived heretic aggressors. Furthermore, neo-liberal globalization has expanded exhibitionist secularism, and in turn spurred a degree of siege mentality among religious fundamentalist non-ruling communities. They have protested against pornography, artificial abortions, free sex and even personal computers connected to the Internet as prominent manifestations of liberal secularism.

Social class and social deprivation also play crucial roles (Hirschl, 2004). The more a non-ruling community perceives itself as socially discriminated against, the more it inclines to draw on religion as a source of violent resistance against hegemonic legal ideology in the domestic and international sphere. Islam, for example, may have moderate hermeneutics towards non-Muslims or, conversely, it may generate very violent hermeneutics; it depends significantly on the leadership and elite that make use of religion in a specific context. Therefore, under conditions of poverty and feelings of deprivation, hostile leadership may turn to faith in transcendental, divine and cosmic justice in order to legitimate even a terrible violence as a means of revolutionizing the praxis and imposing religious law on earth. While the junction of religion and technology often serves religions in their educational purposes, the use of modern technology may also instigate ruthless violent events.

More generally, however, as essays in this volume convey, religion is not analogous to violence. First, the practice of religion exceeds that of violence since it is more compound and complex phenomenon that habitually reflects the deepest of human desires. Second, the sources of violence are not necessarily religious and, as history tells us, they may certainly be secular as well. The challenge of globalization is to reconcile religiosity, religion and religious fundamentalism with international human rights.

In a local-global religious context of communities, two processes may unfold. First, as this volume shows, religion may be generated as transnational and construct cross-national, even supranational, identities and practices that are being expanded through information technologies, such as international media and the Internet (Santos, 1995; also Barzilai-Nahon and Barzilai, Chapter 13). Hence, liberalism is becoming a major and dialectical source of advancing religious values, norms and practices. Second, this volume also argues that religious communities may construct practices that are affected by liberalism. Thus, religious women affected by a liberal climate may wish to gain more equality within their non-liberal community without secularizing it. In such circumstances they would raise religious arguments for gender equality based on both human dignity and preservation of the communal culture.

Last: Is 11 September 2001 a Final Word?

Especially since the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001, we should not be misled by liberal expectations of separating the state from religion, nor should we be captives of illusions concerning an all-encompassing globalization of secular values and an inevitable cultural war between them and religious fundamentalism. The centrality of religion in modernity will continue to prevail as a major challenge that exceeds issues of violence and terrorism. The various essays in this volume show and argue for the interplay between religion as a comprehensive and dynamic transnational phenomenon and modernity that is both resisted by, constituted and generated through religion. Law is a major field in which these dialectical interactions have been transhistorically constituted.

Can we reconcile between legal texts of religions, even those that are practised by non-liberal religious communities and the aspiration for a universal code of human rights? This is a challenge for law and society scholars that the essays in this volume pose. The abstraction of basic human rights from the diversity of religions should and can be a component in the aspiration for a universal minimal legal code. That code should admit cultural relativity and the need to sanctify the plurality of religions in law. It should also acknowledge the importance of political spaces in which different religious communities may be included as legitimate components in traditions of legality. This volume proves that religions should be subjected to a careful deconstruction process through which we should better understand religion as a field of power, faith, legality and hermeneutics, which cannot escape diverse contextualization in different localities.

References

- Asad, T. (1993), Genealogies of Religion: Discipline and Reasons of Power in Christianity and Islam, Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Barry, B. (1995), Justice as Impartiality, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Barzilai, G. (2003), Law and Communities. Politics and Cultures of Legal Identities, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Bruce, S. (1999), Choice and Religion: A Critique of Rational Choice, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Carter, L.S. (1995), The Dissent of the Governed. A Meditation on Law, Religion, and Loyalty, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Hirschl, R. (2004), 'Constitutional Courts vs. Religious Fundamentalism: Three Middle East Tales', Texas Law Review, 82, pp. 1819–60.
- Hoebel, E.A. (1954), The Law of Primitive Man: A Study in Comparative Legal Dynamics, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Juergensmeyer, J. (2000), Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Lev, D.S. (1972), Islamic Courts in Indonesia: A Study in the Political Bases of Institutions, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Lev, D.S. (2000), Legal Evolution and Political Authority in Indonesia: Selected Essays, The Hague: Kluwer Law International.
- MacIntyre, A. (1984), After Virtue: A Study in Moral Theory, London: Duckworth.
- MacIntyre, A. (1988), Whose Justice? Which Rationality?, Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Merry, E.S. (1988), 'Legal Pluralism', Law & Society Review, 22(5), pp. 869–96
- Migdal, S.J. (1988), Strong Societies, Weak States, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Migdal, S.J. (2004), Boundaries and Belonging: States and Societies in the Struggle to Shape Identities and Local Practices, New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Pape, A.R. (2005), Dying to Win: The Strategic Logic of Suicide Terrorism, New York: Random House.

- Pickering, W.S.F. (1984), Durkheim's Sociology of Religion, London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Pospisil, L. (1973), 'E. Adamson Hoebel and the Anthropology of Law', Law & Society Review, 7(4), pp. 537–39.
- Rawls, J. (1973), A Theory of Justice, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rawls, J. (1993), Political Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Sandel, J.M. (1982), Liberalism and the Limits of Justice, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sandel, M.J. (1996), Democracy's Discontent, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Santos D.S.B. (1995), Towards a New Commonsense: Law, Science, and Politics in Paradigmatic Transition, Routledge: New York.
- Shachar, A. (2001), Multicultural Jurisdictions: Cultural Differences and Human Rights, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sturm, D. (1983), 'Constitutionalism and Conscientiousness: The Dignity of Objection to Military Service', The Journal of Law and Religion, 1, pp. 265–78.
- Twining, W.L. (ed.) (1986), Legal Theory and Common Law, Oxford: Blackwell.
- Twining, W.L. (2000), Globalisation and Legal Theory London: Butterworths.
- Weber, M. (1951), The Religion of China – Confucianism and Taoism, Glencoe, IL: The Free Press.
- Weber, M. (1952), Ancient Judaism, Glencoe, IL: The Free Press.
- Weber, M. (1956), The Protestant Ethics and the Spirit of Capitalism, New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.
- Weber, M. (1960), The Religion of India: The Sociology of Hinduism and Buddhism, Glencoe, IL: The Free Press.

Bibliography

- Benhabib, S. (1992), Situating the Self: Gender, Community and Postmodernism in Contemporary Ethics, New York: Routledge.
- Bix, B. (1996), 'Natural Law Theory', in D. Patterson (ed.), A Companion to Philosophy of Law and Legal Theory, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing Ltd, pp. 223–40.
- Boyle, H.E. and Preves, E.S. (2000), 'National Politics as International Process: The Case of Anti-Female-Genital-Cutting Laws', Law & Society Review, 34(3), pp. 703–37.
- Calavita, K. (2001), 'Blue Jeans, Rape, and the "De-Constitutive" Power of Law', Law & Society Review, 35(1), pp. 89–115.
- Crenshaw, K., Gotanda, N., Peller, G. and Thomas, K. (eds) (1995), Critical Race Theory, New York: The New Press.
- Currie, P.E. (1968), 'Crimes without Criminals: Witchcraft and Its Control in Renaissance Europe', Law & Society Review, 3(1), pp. 7–32.
- Dahl, R.A. (1971), Polyarchy. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Epstein, L. and Knight, J. (1998), The Choices Justices Make. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly.
- Ewick, P. and Silbey, S.S. (1998), The Common Place of Law; Stories from Everyday Life. Chicago: Chicago University Press.
- Feeley, M.M. and Rubin, L.E. (1998), Judicial Policy Making and the Modern State, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Fletcher, P.G. (1996), 'Punishment and Responsibility', in R. Patterson (ed.), A Companion to Philosophy of Law and Legal Theory, Oxford: Blackwell Publishers.
- French, R.R. (1998), 'Lamas, Oracles, Channels and the Law: Reconsidering Religion and Social Theory', Yale Law Journal and Humanities, 10, pp. 505–36.
- French, R.R. (2001), 'Time in the Law', University of Colorado Law Review, 72(3), pp. 663–748.

- Friedman, M.L. (1990), The Republic of Choice. Law, Authority, and Culture, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Garth, B. and Sterling, J. (1998), 'From Legal Realism to Law and Society: Reshaping Law for the Last Stages of the Social Activist State', Law & Society Review, 32(2), pp. 409–71.
- Geertz, C. (1973), The Interpretation of Cultures, New York: Basic Books.
- Greenberg, G.J., Minow, L.M. and Roberts, E.D. (eds) (1998), Women and the Law, New York: Foundation Press.
- Horwitz, J.M. (1992), Transformation of American Law 1870–1960, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Horwitz, J.M. (1996), 'Natural Law and Natural Rights', in A. Sarat and T. Kearns (eds), Legal Rights: Historical and Theoretical Perspectives. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Ifeka, C. (2000), 'Ethnic "Nationalities", God and the State: Whither the Federal Republic of Nigeria?', Review of African Political Economy, 27, pp. 450–59.
- Jacob, H., Blankenburg, E., Kritzer, H.M., Provine, M. and Sanders, J. (1996), Courts, Law and Politics, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Kairys, D. (ed.) (1990), The Politics of Law, New York: Pantheon Books.
- Katz, J. and Weissler, C. (1996), 'On Law, Spirituality, and Society in Judaism', Jewish Social Studies, 2(2), pp. 87–115.
- Kymlicka, W. (1995), Multicultural Citizenship: A Liberal Theory of Minority Rights, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Lahav, P. (1997), Judgment in Jerusalem, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Likhovski, A. (1999), 'Protestantism and the Rationalization of English Law: A Variation on a Theme by Weber', Law & Society Review, 33(2), pp. 365–91.
- Lomosky, E.L. (1987), Persons, Rights, and the Moral Community, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mautner, M., Sagie, A. and Shamir, R. (eds) (1998), Multiculturalism in a Jewish and Democratic State – A Book in the Memory of Ariel Rozen-Zvi, Tel Aviv: Ramot (in Hebrew).
- McCann, M.W. (1994), Rights at Work, Chicago: Chicago University Press.
- Messick, B. (1988), 'Kissing Hands and Knees: Hegemony and Hierarchy in Shari'a Discourse', Law & Society Review, 22(2), pp. 637–59.
- Minow, M., Ryan, M. and Sarat, A. (eds) (1993), Narrative, Violence, and the Law: The Essays of Robert Cover. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Raz, J. (1994), Ethics in the Public Domain. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Reece, D. (1996), 'Covering and Communication: The Symbolism of Dress among Muslim Women', Howard Journal of Communication, 7(1), pp. 35–52.
- Renteln, D.A. and Dundes, A. (eds) (1994), Folk Law: Essays on the Theory and Practice of Lex Non Scripta, Vols I and II, Madison, WI: The University of Wisconsin Press.
- Roberts, E.D. (1999), 'Why Culture Matters to Law: The Difference Politics Makes', in A. Sarat and R.T. Kearns (eds), Cultural Pluralism, Identity Politics, and the Law, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press.
- Rosen, L. (1980), 'Equity and Discretion in a Modern Islamic Legal System', Law & Society Review, 15(2), pp. 217–45.
- Rosenberg, G. (1991), The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring about Social Change?, Chicago: Chicago University Press.
- Sarat, A. and Kearns, R.T. (1996), Legal Rights: Historical and Theoretical Perspectives, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press.
- Sarat, A. and Kearns, R.T. (1999), Cultural Pluralism, Identity Politics, and the Law, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press.
- Scheingold, A.S. (1974), The Politics of Rights: Lawyers, Public Policy, and Political Change, New Haven and London: Yale University Press.

- Selznick, P. (1992), The Moral Commonwealth-Social Theory and the Promise of Community, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Sheff, L. (1996), Legal Authority and the Essence of the Regime: On the Rule of Law, the Approach of the State and Israeli Heritage, Tel Aviv: Papyrus (in Hebrew).
- Smith, M.R. (1997), Civic Ideals – Conflicting Visions of Citizenship in U.S. History, New Haven and London: Yale University Press.
- Starr, J. (1989), 'The Role of Turkish Secular Law in Changing the Lives of Rural Muslim Women, 1950–1970', Law & Society Review, 23(3), pp. 497–523.
- Therault, B. (2000), 'The Catholic Church in Eastern Germany: Strategy and Rhetoric of a Changing Minority', Religion, State, and Society, 28(2), pp. 163–73.
- Trubek, M.D. (1986), 'Max Weber's Tragic Modernism and the Study of Law in Society', Law & Society Review, 20(4), pp. 573–98.
- Weber, M. (1922/1964), The Sociology of Religion, Boston, MA: Beacon Press.
- Williams, R.B. (1998), 'Asian Indian and Pakistani Religions in the United States' Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 58, pp. 178–95.

Suggested Further Reading

- Barzilai, G. (2001), 'Law is Politics: Comments on "Law or Politics: Israeli Constitutional Adjudication as a Case Study"', UCLA Journal of International Law and Foreign Affairs, 6(1), pp. 207–13.
- Brown, J. Nathan (1995), 'Law and Imperialism: Egypt in Comparative Perspective', Law & Society Review, 29(1), pp. 103–25.
- Dane, P. (1996), 'Constitutional Law and Religion', in D. Patterson (ed.), A Companion to Philosophy of Law and Legal Theory, Oxford: Blackwell, pp. 113–25.
- Hostetler, A.J. (1993), Amish Society, Baltimore, MD: The Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Kidder, L.R. and Hostetler, A.J. (1990), 'Managing Ideologies: Harmony as Ideology in Amish and Japanese Societies', Law & Society Review, 24(4), pp. 895–922.
- Shamir, R. (2000), The Colonies of Law – Colonialism, Zionism, and the Law in Early Palestine, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sierra, T.M. (1995), 'Indian Rights and Customary Law in Mexico: A Study of the Nahuas in the Sierra de Puebla', Law & Society Review, 29(2), pp. 227–54.